

T U E S D A Y, SEPTEMBER 15, 1767.

The following Letter, we believe, will amuse our Readers. It has never yet been published, though the first SEVEN Letters have long ago made their Appearance. It was addressed to EARL T—, October 5, 1762.

Red-Lion, at Bagshot, Tuesday, ten at night.

MY LORD,

I Had the honour of transmitting to your Lordship copies of seven letters which passed between — and me. As the affair is now over, I enclose an original letter of Col. B—y's with a copy of mine previous to it, which fixed the particulars of our meeting, and therefore remained a secret, very sacredly kept by the four persons concerned.

I came here at three this afternoon, and about five I was told, that — and Colonel B—y were in the house. — had been here at one, and was gone again, leaving a message however, that he would soon return. I had continued in the room where I was at my first coming, for fear of raising any suspicion. I sent a compliment to Col. B—y, and that I wished to see him. He was so obliging as to come to me directly. I told him that I supposed we were to sup together with —, whom I was ready to attend, as became a private gentleman, and that he and Mr. H—, as our seconds, would settle the business of the next morning, according to my letter to him from Winchester, and his answer. B— said, that his — desired to finish the business immediately. I replied, that the appointment was to sup together that evening, and fight in the morning, that in consequence of such an arrangement, I had, like an idle man of pleasure, put off some business of real importance, which I meant to settle before I went to bed. I added, that I was come from M— Abbey, where the Jovial Monks of St. Francis had kept me up till four in the morning, that the world would there conclude that I was drunk, and form no favourable opinion of his — from a duel at such a time, that it more became us both to take a cool hour of the next morning, as early as one as was agreeable to —. B—y said, that he had undertaken to bring us together, and, as we were both at Bagshot, he would leave us to settle our own business. He then asked me, if I would go with him to —. I said I would any moment he pleased. We went directly with my A—, Mr. H—.

I found — in an agony of passion. He said, that I had injured, that I had insulted him, that he was not used to be injured, or insulted: What did I mean? Did I, or not, write the North-Briton, of August the 21st, which affronted his honour? He would know; he insisted on a direct answer: Here were his pistols. I replied that he would soon use them, that I desired to know by what right his — catechised me about a paper, which did not bear my name; that I should never resolve him that question, till he made out the right of putting it; and that if I could have entertained any other idea, I was too well bred to have given his — and Col. B—y the trouble of coming to Bagshot. I observed that I was a private English gentleman, perfectly free and independent, which I held to be a character of the highest dignity; that I obeyed with pleasure a gracious Sovereign; but would never submit to the arbitrary dictates of a fellow subject, a L— S— of his —; my superior indeed in rank, fortune, and abilities, but my equal only in honour, courage and liberty. — then asked me, if I would fight him that evening. I said, that I preferred the next morning, as it had been settled before, and gave my reasons. His — replied, that he insisted on finishing the affair immediately. I told him that I should very soon be ready, that I did not mean to quit him, but would absolutely first settle some important business relative to the education of an only daughter, whom I tenderly loved, that it would take up but very little time, and I would immediately after decide the affair in any way he chose, for I had brought both sword and pistols. I rung the bell for pen, ink, and paper, desiring his — to conceal his pistols, that they might not be seen by the waiter. He soon after became half frantic, and made use of a thousand indecent expressions, that I should be banged, damned, &c. I said, that I was not to be frightened, or in the least affected, by such violence; that God had given me a firmness and spirit equal to his —'s or any man's; that cool courage should always mark me, and that it would be seen how well bottomed I was.

After the waiter had brought pen, ink, and paper, I proposed that the door might be locked, and not opened till our business were decided. — on this proposition became quite outrageous, declared that this was a meer butchery, and that I was a wretch, who sought his life. I reminded him, that I came there on a point of honour, to give his — satisfaction; that I mentioned the circumstance of locking the door only to prevent all possibility of interruption, and that I should in every circumstance be governed, not by the turbulence of the most violent temper I had ever seen, but by the calm determinations of our two seconds, to whom I implicitly submitted. — then asked me, if I would deny the paper. I answered, that I neither would own, nor deny it; if I survived I would afterwards declare, not before. Soon after he grew a little cooler, and in a soothing tone of voice said, I have never, I believe, offended Mr. Wilkes; why has he attacked me? he must be sorry to see me unhappy. I asked, upon what grounds his — imputed the paper to me; that Mr. Wilkes would justify any paper to which he had put his name, and equally assert the privilege of not giving any answer whatever about a paper which he had not; that this was my undoubted right, which I was ready to seal with my blood. He then said he admired me exceedingly; really loved me, but I was an unaccountable animal—such parts! but would I kill him who never offended me? &c.

We had after this a good deal of conversation about the Bucks Militia, and the day his — came to see us on Wycombe Heath, before I was Colonel. He soon after flamed out again; and said to me you are a murderer, who want to kill me, but I am sure I shall kill you, I know I shall, by G—d. If you will fight, if you will kill me, I hope you will be banged. I know you will. I asked, if I was first to be killed and afterwards banged; that I knew his — fought me with — p—n in his pocket, and I fought with a halter about my neck; that I would fight him for all that, and if he fell I should not tarry here a moment for the tender mercies of such a M—ry, but would directly proceed to the next stage, where my valet de chambre waited for me, and from thence I would make the best of my way to France, as men of honour were sure of protection in that kingdom. He seemed much affected by this. He then told me, that I was an unbeliever, and wished to be killed. I could not help smiling at this, and observed we did not meet at Bagshot to settle articles of faith, but points of honour; that indeed I had no fear of dying, but I enjoyed life as much as any one in it; that I was as little subject to be gloomy, or even peevish, as any Englishman whatever; that I valued life, and the fair enjoyments of it so much, I would never quit it by my own consent, except on a call of honour.

I then wrote a letter to your Lordship, respecting the education of Miss Wilkes, and gave you my poor thanks for the steady friendship, with which you have so many years honoured me. Colonel B—y took the care of the letter, and I have since desired him to send it to Stowe, for the sentiments of the heart at such a moment are beyond all politics, and indeed every thing else, but such virtue as Lord Temple's.

When I had sealed my letter, I told —, that I was entirely at his service, and I again desired that we might decide the affair in the room, where there could not be a possibility of interruption; but he was quite inexorable. He then asked me how many times we should fire? I said, that I left it to his choice: I had brought a flask of powder, and a bag of bullets. Our seconds then charged our pistols, which my — had brought. They were large horse pistols. It was that we should fire at the word of command, to be given by one of our seconds. They tossed up and it fell to my A— to give the word. We then left the inn, and walked to a garden some distance from the house, it was near seven, and the moon shone very bright. We stood about eight yards distant, and agreed not to turn round before we fired, but continued facing each other. H. gave the word. Both our fires were in very exact time, but neither took effect. I walked up immediately to —: And told him that now I avowed the paper. His — paid me the highest encomiums on my courage, and he said he would declare every where that I was the noblest fellow God had ever made. He then desired, that we might now be made good friends, and retire to the inn to drink a bottle of claret together, which we did with great good humour and much laugh. — afterwards went to Windsor, B. and H. to Winchester, and I continue here till to-morrow morning, waiting the return of my valet de chambre, to whom I have sent a messenger. B. told me, that he was grieved for — and passion, and admired my courage and coolness beyond his farthest idea; that was his expression.

I have a million of other particulars to relate, but I blush already at the length of this letter. Your Lordship will soon see Colonel B. and I hope in a few days to pay my devours at Stowe. I intend to be at Aylebury quarter sessions by Thursday dinner.

My most respectful compliments always attend Lady Temple.

I am ever, my dear Lord,

Your Lordship's very devoted,

And obedient humble servant,

JOHN WILKES;

From a late English Paper.

AT a time when the near approach of the general Election occasions an universal solicitation for voices through the kingdom, it behoves every man, who has the welfare of his country at heart, to be cautious how he promises his voice, since engaging himself to a Candidate, of whose principles he does not entertain the most perfect veneration, is as criminal in him as the meanest of an actual legislator, who devotes himself to the purposes of a weak or wicked Minister.

During the civil wars in Oliver Cromwell's time, a self-denying ordinance was entered into by the members of the House of Commons, by which the representatives of the people were universally prohibited from accepting of any place; the ordinance though a good one, was nevertheless evaded, and Oliver himself retained his seat, while he had a very principal command in the army. An institution pretty similar to this has been established in latter times, and though no member of parliament has been rendered incapable of holding a place under the government, still it was made necessary for every member to vacate his seat, and to undergo the formality of a new election, where he even accepted of an employment with the general concurrence of the whole kingdom. This re-election was in fact, all that the most strenuous advocate for freedom could possibly desire; it would be hard as well as impolitic, where a gentleman was capable of serving his country, that he should not be also permitted to serve his king; the only design of a re-election was to prevent the nation from being trampled on, by the creatures of a Minister, and to interweave the laurel of public spirit round the emeralds of a crown.

The great in fact, are always suspicious of the little, but the little with a stronger degree of justice out to be suspicious of the great; I am therefore to give a public opinion. My opinion then is this, that the electors of Great-Britain should seize the approaching opportunity to remedy every error in the constitution, those who wish well to the general good, must immediately agree with the general sense of the public; when I say those, I mean candidates for parliament only; as to the constituents, unless they show themselves men upon this occasion, it does not signify how much they are oppressed, provided they reduce their expressions to the humanity of their minds, and instead of freemen, hereafter distinguish themselves by the appellation of slaves.

TWO ENTERTAINING AND INSTRUCTING
ORIENTAL FABLES.

FABLE I.

WHEN Azib the Persian yet lived in the house of Selim his father, it was his custom at midnight to read and meditate on the words of life, which had been recorded by the Prophet. But why, said Azib, should I read the Alcoran to myself? Let my zeal be known to others as an example, and in their ears let my voice be the voice of truth. Azib communicated his purpose to his father, and in the evening the family was summoned, the book was opened, and Azib read. His father listened with attention and reverence, but the rest of the family at length fell asleep. The father was silent, but Azib exclaimed with anger, contempt, and disappointment. What shameful negligence! what horrid impiety! has slumber stolen upon my eyes! have I sacrificed my duty to sleep! my soul is warmed and quickened with devotion; I feel its power at the source of life, and I rejoice in the earnest of immortality. My son, said the father, in a soothing and gentle voice, excuse the infirmity which thou dost not feel, and exact not a tribute which they cannot pay. The will has no power by which sleep can be controlled. The sun has been now long set, the captive forgets his chains, and the Prince his purple; fear and hope thro' all Persia are alike suspended, the pains and pleasures of life forgotten. It is in thy power to judge with candour, to wake and worship is not theirs; with them I might sleep and be forgiven, but mercy itself is provoked to punish ostentatious duty, and malignant censure.

FABLE II.

WHEN the Angel of death removed Soliman from the throne of Persia, it was attended by Mirza his son. Mirza was in the vigour and beauty of life; art and nature was subservient to his wish; and he withheld not his soul from any joy.

Among the women that had been brought to his Seraglio was Selima. She was beautiful as the daughter of Paradise, and had touched the bosom of Mirza with love; with a tender, an ardent, and a faithful passion, which boundless variety can neither produce nor gratify. One evening, after having spent the day with this favourite of his heart, as he was negligently reclined upon his Sopha, and his mind wandering after new pleasures, which absolute dominion had put into his power, he suddenly fixed his eyes upon the ground, and a sigh involuntarily escaped him. How delightful a seat, said he, is a throne! How many passions are gratified by the power it bestows! But alas! who can stop the flight of time! O that I could live and reign for ever! And why, said Selima, leaning tenderly over him, should such a wish steal upon the heart of my Lord? A wish for perpetual love might have been permitted: In the wish for perpetual love I would have joined: O! that his vows, his desires, his fires and languors, in sweet succession might be felt for ever! If we could always love, without satiety or interruption, caressing and caressed, we should indeed participate the delight of superior beings, who have a claim to immortality. But the wish that perpetuity had been ordained to the pleasures of dominion must be renounced: If the most wise and merciful, who appointed all things for the best, had decreed, that he who enjoyed royalty should enjoy it for ever, no share of this blessing could have been the portion of my lord: Mirza would now have been the slave of his predecessor, and would neither have been adored by the whole world nor me.

L O N D O N, JUNE 15.

A Modern traveller being lately asked, Whether he thought the French People more taxed than the English? gave the following answer: "When I see the country of England smiling at the cultivation, the grounds exhibiting all the productions of agriculture, parcelled out in beautiful inclosures, corn-fields, hay, pasture, woodland, and common; when I see her meadows stocked with cattle, her downs with sheep; when I view her horses and oxen, large and strong, fat and sleek; when I see her farm-houses, the inhabitants of plenty, cleanliness, and convenience, and her peasants well fed, lodged and clothed, tall, stout, hale, and jolly; I cannot help concluding that the people are able to bear those impositions which the public necessities have rendered necessary: On the other hand, when I perceive such signs of poverty, misery and dirt, among the commonalty of France; their unfenced fields dug up in despair, without the intervention of meadow or fallow ground, without cattle to furnish manure, without horses to execute the plans of agriculture; their farm-houses mean, their furniture wretched, their apparel beggarly; themselves and their beasts the images of famine; I cannot help thinking they groan under oppression either from their landlords or their government; probably from both."

We hear that a certain German Prince, who lately left this capital, a day or two before his departure, being invited to dine at a noble Lord's in Pall-Mall, happened in the course of conversation to talk of leaping, and mentioned, that he saw a man in his father's dominions who leaped forty yards in three leaps. A celebrated wit in company, looked upon the relation to be a banter upon English credulity, smartly replied, "I am glad, Sir, this extraordinary man (for the credit of his sovereign) did not make a fourth jump, as one more must have carried him entirely out of your father's dominions."

On Saturday last died, in the Royal Hospital, at Chelsea, Robert Cumming, being upwards of 116 years of age. He was a dragoon in the reign of King William, and remained in the service till within a few years of one hundred.

According to the latest observations made by navigators, the island of St. Helena appears to be removed near one degree and a half farther North, within the short space only of three years. Quere, From the late unnatural weather which has prevailed in this kingdom, may not the island of Great-Britain be supposed to have suffered by the change, and in the general whirl to have been removed, at least a degree or two, nearer the Pole?

JUNE 16. The duties upon logwood, exported from this kingdom, will, it is said, be discontinued.

The King of Prussia's recalling all his deserters at this time, occasions much speculation; he seldom does this but when he is near an hour of business; because, as they have been trained to arms, they want no fresh teaching, and the moment they join the corps, an expense begins, which, in that country of economy, is avoided with all possible circumspection.

To the honour of our amiable and benevolent sovereign, we are credibly informed, that there is nothing he does with so much reluctance as signing a death-warrant; and that when he does, his hand is always seized with such a tremor, that it is with difficulty he writes his name.

Don Pernetti, a learned Benedictine, has obtained the Pope's Permission, and Leave of his Superior, to go to Berlin, to take upon him the Post of Librarian to the King of Prussia.

JUNE 20. From the number of little employments every day given to the dependents of a few great men, a change in the administration is prognosticated; the sagacious thinking there would be no necessity of providing for such numberless understrappers at once, if the power was likely to continue much longer in the hands of the principals.

This week some dispatches of importance were received in town from his Excellency General O'Hara, Governor of Senegambia, in consequence of which, it is said, some additional ships of war will be sent out, to reinforce those already on that station.

By the Crutenden from Coast and Bay, there is advice that Lord Clive is on his passage home, and is expected to arrive in a fortnight; and, we hear, that his Lordship hath not only received the large debt due from Sourah Doula, but two millions in specie besides on the company's account.

They write from Senegal, that a crew of pirates in an armed schooner, who had committed divers robberies on the coast, finding themselves pursued by an English man of war, and that it was impossible to escape her, blew themselves up by setting fire to the powder room, and every one on board perished.

JUNE 23. It is said Lord Clive will be created Earl of Tiverton, of Tiverton in Devonshire.

Yesterday the purser of the Crutenden brought a letter to the India-house from Lord Clive, giving an account that all was at peace in the East-Indies; that Lord Clive was recovered from a very dangerous fit of illness, and that his Lordship was to sail for England in the Britannia, about the 15th of January last; that Meer Jaffer, the last Nabob of Bengal, had by his will left his Lordship five lacks of ruppes, amounting to sixty thousand pounds, which his Lordship has given as a fund for the benefit of distressed officers, their widows, and disabled soldiers.

Another letter from the East-Indies says, that, besides the money left by Meer Jaffer to Lord Clive, and which his Lordship has generously settled on the widows and orphans of those officers and soldiers, who lost their lives in the service, the Nabob, who succeeded Meer Jaffer, on hearing of the application of such monies, had added the sum of thirty thousand pounds thereto, to be applied in the same manner.

Letters from Genoa say, that thirty-eight of the last convey of Jews from Spain, perished in their passage.

Though the frequent accounts from France, some time ago, of the ravages committed by the wild beasts of the Gervaudan, were in general disbelieved here, yet the following passage in the Abbé Coyer's letter to Dr. Maty, Secretary of the Royal Society, seems to assert their reality. "At London you would not believe in our wild beasts of the Gervaudan; but engraved ludicrous prints of it, for your amusement, while we suffered under its devastation. Why should we treat your giants any better than you our wild beasts?"

To the PRINTER.

"I was sensibly affected with a report I heard lately, that this country was likely to be soon deprived of the services of that virtuous and able minister General Conway, to whose honesty and zeal for the public good we are all so highly indebted. I heard this so generally asserted, that I own I at first gave credit to it, but I had afterwards the pleasure to find that there was no foundation for it."

Next Monday night, we hear, the following question will be debated at the Robinood in Butcher Row, Temple-Bar: "Whether the consent of the people is not the only equitable foundation of government?" The question, "Which is the greater criminal, a thief or an adulterer, debated last Monday night, was thus determined, by a very great majority of the company: To rob a man of the most sacred part of his property must be esteemed, by a man of the least delicacy, a greater crime than to take any other part of it from him; an adulterer does this; therefore he is a greater criminal than a thief, and therefore the law is now too favourable to the former, in not allotting him a severer punishment than the latter.—After this the following question was also debated: "Is a man fit to be trusted whose conscience is directed by another?" Determined almost unanimously in the negative. The question was chiefly considered in a political light, with respect to a certain gentleman, whose actions are said to be directed by an invisible agent.

It is said that a scheme is now under consideration to prevent and suppress all private conventicles in this metropolis.

JUNE 25. Tuesday, at a court of common council, held at Guildhall, the following motion was made by Mr. Deputy Roffiter, and seconded by Mr. Machell:

That the freedom of this city be presented to the Right Hon. Charles Townsend, chancellor and under treasurer of his Majesty's Exchequer, one of the Lords commissioners for executing the office of Lord high treasurer of Great-Britain, and one of his Majesty's most honourable Privy council, as a tribute justly due to his distinguished talents, so happily employed, and so successfully exerted, in the service of his King and Country, and as a mark of our gratitude for the late instances of his regard to the city of London, and readiness to promote its embellishment, convenience, and prosperity; but more especially for his sedulous application and endeavours to promote the trade and manufactures of this kingdom, to lessen the public debt, and with this salutary view to diminish the expences and improve the revenues of the state, without weakening the national force or laying additional burthens upon commerce; for his spirit and resolution in advising the extraordinary but necessary exertion of power in favour of the poor, under the alarming prospect of famine, without attempting to endanger the liberties of his country by exalting the royal prerogative above the law: And lastly, for his well tempered zeal in support of the undoubted legislative authority of the King and Parliament of Great-Britain over all parts of his Majesty's dominions.

That a copy of the freedom of this city, with the resolution of the court inserted therein, be delivered by the chamberlain to the Right Hon. Charles Townsend, chancellor and under treasurer of his Majesty's exchequer, in a gold box of the value of one hundred guineas.

That the said resolutions be fairly transcribed, and signed by the Town-Clerk, and by him forthwith delivered to the said Gentleman.

That the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor be requested to provide the gold box upon this occasion.

JUNE 26. At a General Court of the East-India company, held at Merchant Taylors Hall on Wednesday last, for reconsidering the prosecutions commenced by the Directors against some of their late servants in Bengal, for presents received by them from the Indian powers, and which, by a former Court, were ordered to be discharged, a question was moved, that the said prosecutions should not be discharged: Debates arose, and an amendment to the question was moved, and carried; but at length the previous question being put, the same was carried in the affirmative, by a majority of 37. It is remarkable, that the gentlemen present, against whom the prosecutions were commenced, divided for the main questions being put by ballot agreeable to the Directors motion.

JUNE 27. Yesterday there was a very great Council at St. James's, to which, it is said, no less than one hundred and six Members of the Privy Council were summoned to attend.

And it is now next to a certainty, that the eminent abilities and integrity of Lord Cambden (which have shone so conspicuously and convictively since his Lordship's high advancement) have now brought over all opposers, and secured the continuance of the Chancellorship to that noble Lord, under all the expected, or almost all possible, state alterations.

Two interviews have been had, in the course of the week, we hear, between a noble Duke in the ministry, and the Earl of Halifax.

The last letters from Poland affirm that the King and ministers are very sedulous in augmenting the national troops, and in taking every precautionary step, in case of a rupture, thro' the present ticklish situation of affairs.

Letters from Pomerania advise, that the cattle there have been inoculated with success, for the contagious illness that has for some time reigned in that country.

The annual produce of the mines in Sweden amounts to 400,000 schipponds, each weighing 400 French pounds; and the number of workmen employed in them is 25,600, who are thereby enabled to maintain their wives and children.

Within these few days, three ships, with a great number of adventurers on board, supposed to be full 300, sailed down the river, to proceed on their voyage to East-Florida.

The reduction of a shilling in the pound upon tea, is a saving to the consumer of that commodity, no less than 230,000l. a year.

Yesterday, at the General Court of the East-India company, held at Merchant Taylors Hall by adjournment, it was unanimously resolved to grant a pension of 1500l. per annum to General Lawrence, during his life, for his many great services to the Company, the said grant to commence from last Christmas. It was also moved, to grant the Company's servants certain gratuities, for their respective services.

It is observable, that one Chippendale, under sentence of death in Newgate a few years since, was respited on condition of being amputated, in order to try the efficacy of Mr. Pierce's styptic, which project was never put in execution no more than the late intended one on Joseph Benham.

INTELLIGENCE EXTRAORDINARY.

From Cornwall we hear, that several Boroughs in that county have come to the laudable resolution of observing the following excellent rules at the next general election for members of parliament:

First, To elect none but such as live among themselves, upon their own estates, independent of the court, and who have the reputation of being worthy, honest gentlemen, in the county, and among their own neighbours in particular.

Secondly, To reject all such candidates as offer them money to be elected.

Thirdly, To reject courtiers, pensioners, military and civil officers, brokers, stockjobbers, South-Sea directors and sharpers, men, who will make it their private interest to act in a good intelligence with ministers, such as they think will be too complaisant to squabble with the court about the liberty of a mob; that is, in their own language, the people; Gentlemen, who will not be so rude as to make a rout about public money embezzled or misapplied at home, or censure dishonourable treaties made abroad, but vote every thing just and honourable, and adequate, without knowing a word of the matter.

Fourthly and lastly, To reject all such candidates as they have reason to suspect will go into the house only to be the tax-gatherers of the court, while they, in the mean time, may be the brewers of wood and drawers of water under them.

From the West end of the Town we hear, that some of the profound Politicians there insinuate, that the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland is to resign upon a pension, and that the Hon. Mr. Yorke, brother to the Right Hon. the Earl of Hardwick, is to succeed him in that high office, if he chooses to accept it, but it is thought he will not, on account of the great chance he has of getting a more important employment at home.

A few days since the celebrated Miss Fanny, late of Cock-Lane, eminent in the profession of knocking and scratching, entered into the service of an American Crimp Durante Vita.—It is imagined she will commence co-partnership with the late little gipsy of Enfield Wash: Should this scheme have any effect, it will certainly prove a great benefit to Old England, by amusing the Americans from political views.

It is said that the King of Prussia hath an army of 60,000 men, in the Dutchy of Cleves. What can be his reason of having such a force so near the Dutch? Does he assemble an army there by way of wooing? If he does, is it not a very extraordinary method of courtship for a female?

PARIS, June 15. The Duke de Fronsac, son of the Marshal Duke de Richlieu, who had the misfortune to lose his lady some months ago, has now lost his only son.

M. de Monclar, attorney general of the Parliament of Provence, gave, on the first of this month, the conclusions which had been required of him the 30th of May. He says in his requisitorial, "that the late events relative to the Jesuits in Spain, threw them into a consternation at first, but that, resuming their criminal audacities, they gave out that their expulsion, far from being an act of clemency, is the effect of intrigue and injustice; that the society is flattered and pursued in every place, through a spirit of irreligion, and that this fresh persecution, which their zeal for the house of God has raised up against them, consummates their martyrdom, and crowns their glory." He demands that the annihilation of the institute be solicited for, in this favourable conjuncture in which Rome can no longer stand out without affronting the majesty of crowned heads, without abandoning the honour and interest of religion, without exposing itself to the tribunal, which reforms the church in the head and the members, &c.

In consequence, an arret was issued the same day, by which all members, both publick and private, of the society, are declared enemies to all powers, and all lawful authority, to the persons of sovereigns, and the tranquillity of states; ordering them to depart the kingdom in fifteen days, &c. The same arret ordains, that the King shall be most humbly beseeched to employ his good offices with the holy see to procure the total extinction of that pernicious order, and to interpose by his sovereign power, to bring about the destruction of the establishments which still subsist in the countries of Avignon and Venaissin.
